Creativity is an awesome way to encourage students to engage with and produce language. Theater, as an art that requires the physical self, is by definition concerned with the "whole child." It can be used as a powerful tool for self-expression. Participating in dialogues supports emotional expression and communication. It's especially helpful for English Second Language (ESL) students who don't often participate in class. They might benefit from a more interactive linguistic environment in which body language and facial expressions are extremely important to meaning. SEL tactics work similarly by employing the entire body to work expressively, not just the vocal tract. The intersection of creativity and mindfulness is something we're especially interested in as creativity is one of the core pillars in how we deliver curriculum.
